“Will There Be a Good Debate About Reproductive Genetic Technologies?”

Using data of how religious people talk about the morality of reproductive genetic technologies, I examine whether a debate about these technologies will be “good” by the normative standards of the public sphere. This talk then contributes to sociological studies of the public sphere as well as cultural sociological theories of the diversity of discourse within populations.