For nearly two decades, progressives have been dismayed by the steady rise of the right in U.S. politics. Often lost in the gloom and doom about American politics is a striking and sometimes underanalyzed phenomenon: the resurgence of progressive politics and movements at a local level. Emphasizing “regional equity,” unusual alliances of labor, community and even business groups have been built around issues of community benefits, housing affordability, and access to transit. Drawing on a wealth of case studies as well as their own experience in the field, Pastor, Benner, and Matsuoka point out the promise and pitfalls of this new approach and argue that what they term social movement regionalism can offer an important contribution to the revitalization of progressive politics in America.

"In the past decade, often below the radar screen of national politics, effective movements have emerged within neighborhoods and, more importantly, at the regional level. This Could Be The Start of Something Big provides a vivid account of some of these efforts and is an important contribution to new thinking about progressive politics."—Paul Osterman, NTU Professor of Human Resources and Management, MIT Sloan School

Manuel Pastor Jr.
Professor of Geography and American Studies & Ethnicity and Director, Program for Environmental and Regional Equity, University of Southern California

Chris Benner
Associate Professor, Community and Regional Development, University of California, Davis

Martha Matsuoka
Assistant Professor, Urban and Environmental Policy Department, Occidental College